How Assessments Can Help You Navigate Workplace Trends Successfully

Three months ago, Emeritus, a global online education company, published its list of growing workplace trends to watch for in 2022. All businesses are contending with changes brought about by the pandemic and everything is in flux all around us. Many of the coming changes are unavoidable but they can be made more manageable.

Some of the trends that will be sure to affect your organization include:

- Resignations
- Talent Shortages
- Remote Work
- A Need For Soft Skills

The challenges created by these changes can be mitigated by a wide range of assessment tools – if they're carefully and thoughtfully applied. There's no magic bullet solution available but accurate, reliable and trustworthy assessments certainly are. There are many ways in which assessments can help organizations identify problems with their corporate culture, help them remedy and develop managers who are struggling, screen for critical skills and competencies, and much more.

Solutions to Your Problems

Are your teams struggling?
There's a test for that!

If you have teams whose members are constantly in conflict with one another then you have teams that aren't producing. Unproductive teams whose members compete rather than cooperate have a deleterious effect on other employees and company morale as well.

Put your problematic teams through some revealing, instructive and helpful paces using tests that are designed to help team members identify how well the current members work together, whether there are issues that will need to be addressed, and then, how to make positive changes.

The team building 'Survival' series of facilitated group learning activities are particularly helpful.

Introducing The Survival Series of Team Building Tools

The Survival Simulation Series exercises require team members to work together effectively to deal with life-threatening situations. These simulations can be used as icebreakers, to establish constructive norms within a new work group, or to introduce members to the value of synergy or to gauge their synergistic problem-solving skills.

Each simulation presents an unfamiliar scenario, such as being stranded in the desert, and asks the team to rank various objects they might need for survival.

The exercises ensure that all team members have the same level of knowledge about the artificial situation (not very much!), so they must rely on their ability to set objectives, analyze alternative strategies, and then evaluate them, choosing a solution that will best meet the objective.

By having team members complete the exercise individually and then as a team, the difference between the individual solutions and the team's solution can be identified. This becomes a real measure of the group's ability to perform as a team.

The series includes:
